Structural forces behind social inequality in education

Social inequality in education remains a central topic in sociology of education because of its continuing prevalence, also in Western societies. Recently, however, politicians seem to be downplaying this issue or to be focusing increasingly on explanations at the individual level, for instance holding parents responsible for their children's educational disadvantage. Nevertheless, the role of structural and systemic factors in causing or enlarging social inequality is clear, and this is exactly the level where policy makers could make a difference. Starting from equal opportunities as a necessary condition for meritocracy to work, this keynote presents the findings of Flemish sociological research at the primary and secondary educational level, demonstrating the impact of educational structures and systems on social disparities in students' educational achievements. By focusing on how systemic features lead to specific student compositions in schools and how these, in turn, relate to students' and teachers' attitudes, structural mechanisms responsible for persistent social inequality in education are revealed. In doing so, the important role sociologists play in gaining insight into societal problems is underlined, necessary in a global context in which sociology as a discipline is increasingly under pressure.
